

Uniting With Inclusion

Inclusion. It's a topic that most people recognize, but a topic that some people differ. But in order to connect and build a strong connection, people need to include each other, regardless of ethnicity, race, gender, and all personalities. But in order to unite using inclusion, we must understand the parts of inclusion that bring it together.

When including, being humble is the cement that holds inclusion together. No matter if you look the best, are the richest, or are the most popular, you have to stay courteous to all people. But once people begin thinking more about themselves, uniting falls apart. Arrogance is always lurking low to get you, but you have the power to avoid the attack.

Patience and accessibility are key points to including each other. You have to be open to communication about different subjects or points of view to include others in. You may be living a nice life but don't know anything about other people's lives. To include people, you have to accept all lives and opinions.

Lastly, equality are the bricks of the whole structure. In order for inclusion to work, everyone has to have equality, and treat everyone equally. If people in the higher area, doesn't mean they have to treat the lower class differently. This would make everybody feel included and treated equal to all other people.

In conclusion, people can be united with inclusion. But inclusion is more than just letting people join you once or a few times, it requires you to be humble, accessible, and equal to one another. Inclusion is really important in making the world a better place.
